ABOUT THE COVER

In 2009, a book was published that introduced the term “Wind Turbine Syndrome,” which is thought to be characterized by headache and dizziness that result from the low frequency sound (LFS) generated by wind turbines. In our cover article this month, “Wind Turbines: Is There a Human Health Risk?”, the authors present a literature review to determine whether LFS leads to negative human health effects. In the reviewed studies the authors found that annoyance plays a large role in people’s perception of wind turbines and additional research is warranted.
