The Presidential Management Fellowship at our agency is to bring in future leaders.

The best part about being a PMF at CDC is the invaluable leadership opportunities that you're given, plus all of the training opportunities.

You get a combination of inspiration and training, and also a lot of challenge and a lot of opportunity to try new things.

Just take advantage of the people right around you. You don't get the artists, the scientists, the laboratory, and like all of that under one roof.

There's a huge network of over 300 PMFs at the CDC.

Having PMF with your name definitely identifies you as someone who is looking for training and looking for mentorship and looking to grow in their career.

I've been asked to do things that I normally would not have done and sort of asked to step out of my comfort zone, and that has done wonders for my professional and personal development.

I think PMF has really helped me to see myself as a leader.

There are people who are within the program. People who have grown with our agencies. People who have moved into areas of management, but have done all that work here at the CDC. It's been really impactful. It makes me feel like I should have been here all along.

Being a PMF means CDC has high expectations of you and equally high respect for your abilities and your contributions to our agency's mission.

A lot of our leaders were PMFs, and so you have this kind of, like, kindred spirit almost.

Being a PMF has completely altered the way that I see my future.

I get to be the future I want to see.

This is the first time where I feel as though I am working at a place that I could stay at indefinitely.

We want to bring you in, we want to train you, we want to develop you, and we want to keep you here at CDC.
